You Are Preaching This Week

Preaching, some people say, is all the pastor has to do. This is true. It does not mean, however, that the 10 to 20 hours he spends in the study preparing the sermon which he delivers in 20 minutes from the pulpit on Sunday is all the preaching he does. Preaching means bearing witness to one's faith. Everything the pastor says and does bears witness to his faith.

If this is true, then all of us are preachers. Bearing witness to our faith is the primary responsibility of every Christian. It's a full-time, seven-day-a-week job. And the preaching out of the pulpit is often more effective than the pulpit-delivered kind.

A certain pastor says that he had tried for years to persuade a man to join the church, but with no success. When the man suddenly began coming to church and finally announced his intention of becoming a member, the pastor asked him, "Just what did I say in my sermons that made you change your mind?" The man answered, "Every Sunday morning from my window I could see a man come down the street to this church. In any kind of weather I could set my watch by him. It made me think that he must find something here that made it worthwhile coming. So to tell the truth, pastor, it wasn't your sermons that changed my mind. It was that man in your church who was faithful to his convictions."

We are preaching sermons every day of the week. The kind of life I lead tells my neighbors just how much Christianity means to me. When I scarcely mention the work of my church, or fail to invite others to attend, they feel it's not very important. When my unchristian habits and attitudes remain unchanged, those who aren't Christians assume that my faith isn't really vital. But when they can see that prayer and regular church attendance give me the desire to correct my faults and the strength to live joyfully and helpfully at the office, in the shop, on the street, at home—then they have heard some powerful preaching. It may eventually bring them face to face with Christ and give them the salvation only he can provide. You are preaching this week! Be sure your sermon is a Christian one!
